A NEW BABY MEANS A NEW PASS

Each time a baby is born into an African family it means another mouth to feed. If the child is born before the age of 13 (or even younger), when the boy is still at school, he may lose his pass. He must have it at home; in the classroom; in the playground, and everywhere he goes. In 1955 the London newspaper the New Statesman published an article written by a young African student named Olir Young Man. He wrote about how he got a pass and how he lost it. He then explained some of the problems that students face when they try to get a pass and keep it.

The pass is a document that allows a student to attend school. It is issued by the government and is only given to students who are registered with the Ministry of Education. The pass is a symbol of the government's support for education and is an important tool for ensuring that students have access to quality education.

In Olir Young Man's case, his pass was taken away because he did not return it after he had used it to go to school. He had to go back to the pass office to get a new one. The official at the pass office told him that he had to bring back a letter from his principal confirming that he had used the pass.

Olir Young Man then explained some of the problems that students face when they try to get a pass and keep it. He wrote about how he had to keep track of his pass and make sure that he returned it after each use. He also wrote about how difficult it was to get a pass in the first place.

In conclusion, Olir Young Man's article highlights some of the challenges that students face when they try to get a pass and keep it. His story serves as a reminder of the importance of education and the need for governments to support and protect students who are pursuing their education.
